This is the little known story of the double personality that often exists in domestic dogs. Just as Dr. Jekyll was transformed into Mr. Hyde, in the same way man's most faithful friend often changes, at night, into a ferocious delinquent, roaming through the countryside attacking chickens and herds of sheep. The next morning the dog is the usual affectionate, overgrown puppy it always was. This is the first step down a road leading slowly towards the breakup of the animal's alliance with man and a return to the wild life of its ancestor, the wolf. Today in Italy feral dogs number more than a million and those who have gob back to the wild are almost 100,000. The phenomenon has reached alarming proportions and even threatens the survival of the last wolves remaining in Italy, estimated to be no more than 200 to 250 specimens.
